PREFACE AND ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This directory was published as a contribution to Research Project H-630 (S-83), "Processing and Marketing Technology of Commercially Cultured Catfish." The research project encompassed a multi-disciplinary study of catfish in the United States. An earlier directory was published in 1971 when the nature and scope of catfish production was unknown. Imperfect knowledge regarding the level of catfish production in Alabama still exists. This directory was intended as an informational guide to producers seeking alternate sources of fingerlings, to buyers seeking alternate supply sources, and as a general guide to the scope and location of catfish production within Alabama.

Appreciation is expressed to the Alabama Cooperative Extension Service and the Soil Conservation Service personnel for their cooperation and assistance in compiling this list of catfish producers. Special appreciation is expressed to the many Alabama catfish producers who provided information for the study.

INTRODUCTION

Alabama Catfish Producers

From the mid-1960's to 1971 the catfish industry in Alabama experienced rapid expansion. In the following three years this growth continued. However, the expansion was not at the same rate experienced in the previous decade.

The catfish operations in the State were classified as belonging to one of four primary types of production: (1) commercial, (2) fishout, (3) combination, and (4) personal use. A miscellaneous category included those people who do raise catfish, but type of production could not be determined with certainty. The definitions of these primary production types were the same as in the 1971 study.

Commercial operations were essentially the same as beef cattle feed-lots. The farmer's major inputs were fingerlings and feed. The size fingerlings stocked ranged from two to eight inches. These small fish were fed a high protein ration until they attained marketable size, 3/4 pound to 1½ pound. The majority of the commercially raised fish were sold to various processors. However, some poundage was marketed through restaurants, food chains, vendors or sold on the farm.

The essential inputs for fishout operations were similar to commercial production. However, since these were basically recreational operations other services may have been provided. The additional services included such things as fishing supplies, piers, boats, or picnic and concession areas. In this method of production a fee was charged for the privilege of fishing and usually an additional charge per pound of liveweight fish caught was paid by the individual.

Some producers allowed fishing in ponds as soon as the fish reached harvestable size. When fishing declined in the pond the remaining fish were harvested. This type of production was classified as combination. The degree of fishout and drain and harvest varied with producers with some harvesting up to 50 percent of the fish by fishout methods.

Many catfish ponds were built for personal use only. These units usually provided more than a single function and often were used for a water supply for livestock, to improve the appearance and/or value of the farm, or simply to provide recreational fishing for family, relatives and close friends. Financial assistance was often provided for these type units by various USDA agencies.

The catfish industry was dynamic due to the characteristics of the fish and the method of raising them. Many farmers changed from one type of production to another, such as from commercial to combination. Others changed their operations from catfish production to recreational units with mixed species of fish, and some drained the ponds and completely abandoned fish production. Most of the catfish producers who changed the operation were small scale producers many of whom had no other farming interests. One factor contributing to the dynamic activity was the length of the "fish cycle". Because the growing season was relatively short it was easier for a fish farmer to convert his pond unit to other uses or terminate production when the cycle passed a peak and prices subsequently decreased. Also, the same type conversions could be made when prices for the necessary inputs began to increase greatly. Inflationary prices on the major variable cost items during 1974 forced some of the smaller scale operators out of the industry. The inflationary factor did not affect the larger scale producers severely, and many of these type operations expanded even in such periods of rising prices. Although growth had occurred in these type fish farms, Alabama was still "behind" some of the other major fish producing areas, such as the Mississippi Delta of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Some catfish farms in this region contained more than 1,500 acres under water. Alabama's largest producer operated a total of 200 acres.

Alabama Catfish Processors, 1974

Two of the major catfish processors were located in Greensboro, Hale County. This was the geographic center of the counties which comprised the major commercial production area. The total annual output for the two plants was about 4.9 million pounds, liveweight in 1974. Approximately 1.7 million pounds, liveweight were being imported from Mississippi annually. If both plants operated at their maximum capacity and no fish from Mississippi were processed in Greensboro, an area within about a 75-mile radius from this town could increase production of catfish for these processors by 12.3 million pounds per year.

The other automated plant was at Holly Pond, Cullman County. This plant operated on a much smaller scale than either of the two plants at Greensboro. With a relatively small amount of acreage currently in production in Cullman County and surrounding areas, this processor relied mainly on Mississippi produced catfish for his markets. This area also had a potential for growth, but some of the land was unsuitable for pond construction.

The processor in Choctaw County is located at Lavaca. This facility's annual output was small. All phases of the processing operation were done by hand, and most of the fish were marketed through various restaurants in the Southeast, with which the owner of the processing plant has an affiliation.

Two additional catfish processing plants were located in Alabama in 1974. The catfish processing plant located in Brundidge in Pike County processed fish for sale to stores, restaurants and individuals. The scope of operation could increase with establishment of additional markets. The processing plant in Citronelle in Mobile County was established to process river fish. The plant began to handle farm raised fish following the decline of the river fishing industry.

Alabama Fingerling Producers

A primary input into catfish production is the feeder catfish. The small fish varying in size from two and one half to ten inches in length are stocked in the pond, fed a high protein ration and harvested as a food fish. Provision of the feeder or fingerling catfish has developed as an enterprise for some producers. Eleven major fingerling producers were identified in 1974. Many larger producers of food fish grew their own fingerlings and may have sold some surplus.

Fingerling production required higher investments, supplementary as well as more highly skilled labor, and more precise water control than food fish production. With growth of the catfish industry specialization in production of fingerlings will increase.

METHOD OF STUDY

Personnel of the Cooperative Extension Service and Soil Conservation Service were contacted in each Alabama county. Each provided lists of all catfish producers who stocked at least 1,000 fish. A mail-out questionnaire was sent to each individual on the list to verify addresses and current production status. In addition major buyers of catfish were contacted to determine the names and addresses of producers. After purging the lists of former producers who no longer stocked catfish, 1,855 producers remained. The producers are listed alphabetically by county with the name of the producer, the type of production and total water acreage devoted to catfish. The addresses of producers were included when available. Type of production was based on information supplied by the producer or the other sources mentioned above and were classified according to the definitions previously presented. The directory presents, as nearly as practical, a complete inventory of catfish producers in Alabama in 1974.

SUMMARY OF DIRECTORY

The 1971 Catfish Directory listed 1,327 catfish producers with 8,871.6 acres of water in production. Only 261 of the producers were engaged in commercial catfish production or 19 per cent of all producers, however over 33 per cent of the total catfish acreage was devoted to commercial catfish production. By 1974 consolidation of production began to occur. Many smaller producers ceased operation while others changed to a different type of production due to lack of markets for fish sales. The number of commercial producers actually decreased by 50 between 1971 and 1974 while commercial acreage increased by approximately 30 percent. Commercial acreage as a percentage of total acreage increased, Table 1.

The 1974 summary revealed a large number of producers with ponds stocked for personal use. A portion of the increase was attributable to improved reporting for the 1974 directory. A portion was due to shifts from other types of production to personal use and a portion was due to stocking of catfish in small ponds designed for stock water or other purposes. As will be shown later the majority of the personal ponds were relatively small.

In 1971, 16 Alabama counties did not have any commercial catfish producers reported while an additional 12 counties listed only one producer, Table 2. By 1974 the number of counties without commercial production increased to 25 while an additional 9 counties reported only one commercial producer. The acreage of commercial production increased in Alabama between 1971 and 1974; however, 28 counties reported a decrease in commercial production and four reported no change in commercial production. Included among the counties with decreased production were 13 which reported no commercial production in 1974. The commercial production figures include fingerling and hatchery operations which may or may not produce food fish.

Commercial production of catfish moved towards concentration in close proximity to the major processing plants located in Hale County in West-Central Alabama. Hale County had 886 acres in commercial production in 1971 and increased to 1,263 by 1974 even though 13 fewer producers were in commercial operation. A seven county area around the two processing plants had 56 percent of the commercial acreage in 1971 and 68 percent in 1974. The assurance of a market for sale of fish tended to stabilize production in the area.

The percentage change in commercial production on the county level was strongly influenced by the scope of the industry within the county in 1971. A small acreage increase or decrease with a small base figure gave a relatively large percentage change in production. Substantial changes did occur in several counties; Barbour County increased in commercial production from 33.5 to 229.5 acres and the proportion of commercial acreage increased from 20 to 67 percent. Randolph County with the largest number of producers and the greatest percentage increase in total acres had no commercial acreage. Only eight counties in 1974 had more than 100 acres of commercial production as shown in the immediately preceding table. Five of the eight were within the market area of the Hale County processors.

Lawrence and Mobile counties also had substantial acreage in combination marketing opportunities. Fishing of a portion of the crop, then drain and harvest of the remainder of the fish often increased returns. Producers entry was limited in rural areas without sufficient demand for fishout. The counties with more than 100 acres of combination production in 1974 are listed below. Lawrence and Sumter counties were included in both commercial and combination production. No distinction was made in the survey between ponds primarily fishout and ponds primarily commercial when both operations occurred in the same pond. All operations that allowed any fishout and ultimately harvested the remaining fish were classified as combination.

Fishout production of catfish represents an entirely different aspect and market for the catfish industry. The basic motivation of buyers is recreation coupled with consumption aspects. A typical fishout producer charged an entry fee for access to the pond and an additional fee based on the poundage caught. Many variations of fee schedules were utilized.

Basically, the buyer performed the harvesting and processing function for the producer. The amount of harvest from a fishout pond was lower but the price per pound harvested was much higher. An adequate supply of customers could only be assured in high population density areas where other fishing opportunities were limited. Six counties had approximately 100 or more acres of water in fishout production as shown below. Of the six counties, four were in north Alabama which is somewhat more urbanized and industrialized. Coffee County was included on both the combination and fishout lists while Tuscaloosa ranked relatively high in commercial acreage. Tallapoosa County represented somewhat of an anomaly. The County has a low population density and is beyond easy commuting range of population centers. The presence of Lake Martin indicates other fishing alternatives were readily available. The listing of fishout operations did not signify that numerous people were fishing in the ponds but only that the ponds were open for fishing. A study of recreational catfish ponds in Alabama indicated that many fishout operations did not return sufficient revenue to justify wages of an attendant to collect fishing fees. Classification of a pond as fishout often involved no more than posting a sign that the lake was open for fishing and installing an honor system fee collection box.

Year to year shifts from fishout to personal use frequently occurred.

Almost half of all Alabama ponds stocked with catfish in 1974 were for the personal recreational use of the owner. Some of the ponds had been designed for commercial operation but restricted to personal use due to lack of time, interest, or market opportunities. Many were also designed for stock watering or recreational ponds. Factors determining the number of ponds developed within a county were difficult to quantify. However, the interest and assistance provided by the Soil Conservation Service, terrain features conducive to pond construction, and the type of agricultural production within an area all served as contributing factors. Only five counties had more than 100 acres of water in personal catfish production in 1974 as shown below. Randolph County had 14.5 acres of personal catfish production listed in 1971 and 327.1 acres listed in 1974. While pond construction and stocking in existing ponds occurred during the three year period, most of the increased acreage was due to an improved inventory of ponds in 1974. The ponds maintained for personal use represented the most difficult classification type to inventory. Since the catfish harvested did not enter market channels information regarding stocking could only be obtained from the source of fingerlings.

Alabama has approximately 30,000 farm ponds containing over 126,000 surface acres of water. Every county in the State has ponds with total county acreage ranging from over 6,000 to less than 500 acres. The catfish directory included many of these ponds; however, the number of personal production ponds stocked with catfish probably was only a small proportion of those in existence in some counties.

Since the catfish directory inventory included all producers who stocked at least 1,000 catfish fingerlings, many small ponds were included. These small ponds represent a demand source for catfish fingerlings and supply fish for household use as well as recreational activity for the owner and others. Research has indicated, however, that economies of scale exist in catfish production. Investment, labor, and management costs increase less than proportionality with increase in water acreage. Commercial production can be expected to develop primarily in larger size units. The quantity of fish that can be harvested from a small pond limits processor willingness to harvest or transport the fish long distances. Consideration of only those producers with five or more acres of water in catfish production does allow an approximation of the short run expansion capabilities of the industry. While all production ponds with water acreage exceeding five acres were not suitable for commercial production and many smaller ponds were specifically designed for commercial production, the demarcation approximately equalizes both.

Growth in catfish production occurred in all pond sizes, Table 3. However, commercial production increased only in the number of producers with 10 acres or more of water. A portion of the decrease was due to producers adding additional pond acreage while the remaining producers shifted to some other type of catfish production. Considering only those producers with over five acres of surface water reduced the effective production to 404 producers with 7,700.2 acres of water, Table 4. The reduction was not evenly distributed by type of production. Within commercial operations 54 percent of the producers had 92 percent of the production acreage. Among personal producers only 27 percent of the acreage was in units larger than five acres. If the acreage in units larger than five acres were converted to commercial production the amount of commercial acreage would almost precisely double. A five acre unit harvested at one time would yield a large enough quantity of fish to warrant travel and harvest expenditure by processors.
